STATE PARK

THE CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

Out of work, out of money, and out of luck. Many Americans struggled during the Great Depression of the 1930s.

Hoping to combat unemployment, President Franklin D. Roosevelt established the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC), a national work program for single men between the ages of 18 and 25. Jobs in the CCC improved the American landscape and sustained the enrollees' families back home. Enrollees planted forests, assisted with soil conservation projects, and built state and national parks. CCC "boys" earned wages and lived in military-like camps, which provided shelter, uniforms, food, and educational and vocational training. Would you have enlisted?

CCC Company 3803 arrived in Lockhart in 1935 and built "Camp Colp" in honor of David E. Colp, a onetime Lockhart resident and the first chairman of the Texas State Parks Board. This camp was across the road from the park entrance. The young men used local lumber and stone to build dams along Clear Fork Creek, the recreation hall, the park residence, a swimming pool, water tower, water fountains, and primitive camping sites. These structures still stand today, except for the original swimming pool, which was replaced in 1974.

Another work program, the Work Projects Administration (WPA), joined CCC Company 3803 to build Lockhart State Park's 9-hole golf course. Upon completion in 1938, the course featured the highest tee box in Texas, which you can still see today.

PRAIRIE REMNANTS

Red-tailed hawk

Imagine a landscape with tall grasses as far as the eye can see. Picture those grasses swaying in the breeze and a herd of buffalo off in the distance. This is what Lockhart State Park looked like thousands of years ago.

Lockhart State Park is located in the Blackland Prairie ecoregion of Texas that, prior to Anglo settlement, was dominated by bunch grasses like indiangrass, little bluestem, and eastern gamagrass. Back then, the prairie was home to buffalo, grey wolves, coyotes, birds, and small mammals.

Today, the landscape looks very different due to farming, ranching, and development. Buffalo and wolves were hunted out of the area, and bunch grasses are no longer common, although they are being reintroduced. Look carefully during your visit and you may find remnants of the park's former landscape.
